Mugdock Castle

The Mugdock Castle was the ancient seat of the Clan Graham between 1372 and 1700. Built around a courtyard, the castle was entered through a gatehouse with a portcullis. The South West Tower has four stories with a single room on each floor. The main entrance to the tower is by external stairs that leads to the Laird's bedroom. In 1641, the castle was partly destroyed on orders from Parliament, but James Graham lived there until 1644. On the execution of James in 1650, the lands were forfeited to the Marquis of Argyll, Archibald Campbell. In 1655 Mugdock was returned to the Grahams and restored over a two-year period. In 1682, the Grahams bought Buchanan Old House near Drymen, a dwelling more fitting the title of "Marquis", but kept the family official seat at Mugdock for a long period of time.

Now, several centuries later, the castle still stands with the Graham heritage intact with a special room housing historical artifacts and documents with valuable clan and Scottish information. The grounds are now a park, which is one of Scotland's most popular visitor attractions offering a great countryside experience. Tours, cultural events, recreational activities, corporate functions and private celebrations take place at Mugdock.

To help preserve this important Graham site, donations and fundraising are necessary. Sales from the Mugdock Collection also help with annual maintenance, restoration and refurbishment efforts.

The plate is 7.5 inches and embellished with two gold bands featuring the Great Montrose. His portrait is befittingly surrounded by laurel nobilis, the clan plant. On the back of the plate is a text etching of the 400th celebration by the Clan Graham Society in North America.

There is only a limited supply of this commemorative plate available. Order this collector's item now and own a piece of Clan Graham history.
